Writing a test will create a test. Run! .One of the main themes of my teaching is that of the importance of mentors. Yes, everyone needs mentors – it's human nature. But what I really stress is that the selection of a mentor should be a significant process for those who are thinking of starting a business. Mentorship comes in a number of different forms but I have found that a wide range of people with a wide range of different expertise can be of real benefit. From mentors who have already forged successful businesses, to people who are still in their first or second year. Whichever you choose, you want to make sure that you pick someone who has the energy and enthusiasm to provide the advice you need and someone who will work with you, not just to give advice and help out. People fall into the profession with very different attitudes. Some think it's a profession and they see their role as being able to make a great living out of it. For them, it's 'what they do'. However, I find that many are naturally good at designing and developing business plans, employing people and getting people to do what they say. They are specialists in their field and, as such, they are often a little pigeon-holed in their thinking. I feel that it is important to ensure that you get the right mentor for you, someone who can think outside of their field and see where you can go. You can turn to successful businessmen and women for advice and to highlight opportunities. However, one of the best ways to find a mentor is to get in touch with people that work in similar fields that you are thinking of entering and see if they have any contacts within their organisation or within their industry who could be of help to you. As a businessperson, having mentors is vital. I have a number of mentors who I would simply call up and say 'I need your help – who should I be talking to?' and they would be able to put me in touch with people who could do some of the things that my mentor mentors did. I
